Spring came, and all over the country there were little flowers and little birds. But in the garden of the selfish Giant it was still winter. The birds did not want to sing in the garden, and the flowers did not grow. But the Snow and the First robin happened. "Spring doesn't look like this garden since we have been here for years," they said. The Snow covered the grass with his great white cloak, and the First robin flew through the trees. The next day the North Wind came to stay with them. He did his best to blow the garden and to blow the chimneys down. "This is a lovely place," he said, "we must look after it very well." So the High chimneys. He ran round and round the garden as fast as he could. He had dressed in green, and his breath was like ice.

"I don't understand why the spring is like this year," said the selfish Giant, while he was sitting in the window looking at the cold white garden: "I hope that the weather changes soon".

But the spring didn't come, and the summer didn't come. In the town there was gladness for the winter garden, but in the Giant's garden there was none. "He is so selfish," the town said. So the snow went there, and the North Wind, and the High chimneys, and the First robin, and the Snow danced through the trees.
