What was life like before industry completely changed people's lives? The BBC series Lark Rise to Candleford brought this life to our screens in a very vivid way. The series follows the lives of a farming community in the village of Lark Rise and the people of a small town called Candleford in the nineteenth century. It is about people's relationships, but it also shows us how they used to live and the changes they were experiencing. We learn how they used to plant their crops and buy and sell their goods. We also see the differences between life in the town and in the country.

In many ways the series shows us a perfect life. The sun is always shining in Lark Rise and the farm workers never look tired or dirty. The town of Candleford is clean and people are always happy. We don't see many poor people or children dressed in old clothes. But although it's a pleasant picture of the past, it raises some important points, for example, the position of women in society. Men used to have all the important jobs and make all the important decisions. The series shows how women began to question this. Another point is how people began to use farm machines. This was progress and it was very exciting for the men who made the machines, but for the farm workers it was different. Their jobs were disappearing and they were frightened of the new world with its tall chimneys and black smoke. Were they right to be afraid? Our lives are very different now because of this progress, but are they better? In the last programme of the series, a machine builder says, 'It takes a lot of courage to move forward.' And a farm worker replies, 'It takes a lot more courage to stand still.'

You can watch the series on Channel 7 on Mondays at 9 pm. It's definitely worth watching!
